Self-Reflection

I think it was really hard for me to come up with a theme for all my expressions. I actually wrote an entire script before the one I actually used for my project. Then I realized that I had to have a theme, so I re-did the script and I found new expressions. Everything else wasn't too hard for me creatively. Drawing my characters didn't take that much thought for me since the idea came really quickly. Drawing the backgrounds wasn't too hard either. I researched what the metro in France looked like and I based my drawing off that. Writing the story was definitely the hardest thing for me. Thinking of scenes that fit with the story took a lot of effort for some reason, but I eventually did it. I found some inspiration from watching previous videos from ImmersionClip and searching up stories related to the expressions. Once I had a general idea of what my scenes were going to be, writing the script wasn't too hard. I also think that editing the video was a bit of a creative challenge. I wanted to make the video a little less boring, so I added text bubbles to the drawing that showed what the characters were saying. I'm really proud of how I used this core competency in the scenes the main character experienced. It was hard for me to make the stories flow and my first draft was way over the time limit, so I had to shave off some parts of the script.
